The Opportunity

With San Diego being the 23rd best city for public education, why is it that computer science (CS) opportunities aren't readily available to high-schoolers? The only "mainstream" hackathon is restricted to college students, thereby discluding a population of roughly 120,000 students in San Diego county alone. San Diego is the 8th largest city by population, and yet no hackathons were conducted for high schoolers – how can we expect these students to be titans of industry without any experience?

Our Solution

The team at Raven Hack knows how to deal with this – a county-wide hackathon. While the idea is daunting, the amount of computer science opportunities, in spite of the breadth of the field, is surprisingly limited. To attend internships, students must have experience, but to get experience, these students need to have work experience. This circular dependency proves that there must be another factor that lets these same students delve into CS – that's where we come in.

What is Raven Hack?

Raven Hack will be the go-to hackathon for high school students in Southern California. Participants will be encouraged to build the best website, app, or game in different categories. After 10 hours, our designated judges (from industry) will determine which projects display the most creativity, intricacy, and conformity to the respective categories and award the participants.

How you can help

Although our team has figured out many of the logistics, the fact remains that Raven Hack will cost money, especially if it's as big as our plans indicate. By sponsoring Raven Hack, not only will students have direct access to some of the biggest tech companies out there, but they may very well also learn of opportunities through recruiters. Conversely, if you're looking for free marketing, we'd be more than happy to advertise your company in exchange for your aid.
